

Coloseum Route

159

We were in in the south East end of the chamber when we entered it so we turned to left to get into the up in part of the room which lies <sup>in the North west to the South East</sup> after looking at the room for about 10 or 15 minutes I discovered a good sized passage leading North from about the center of the East side. We then proceeded to investigate it, and after following it for about 20 feet we discover a room of extraordinary importance. Its greatest length is about 80 feet while I should judge that its greatest width is about 35 feet. The ceiling is nearly horizontal but the floor is so irregular in places that it is hard to get an average height of it. The greatest height of the ceiling is about 30 feet while the minimum in the center of the room is about 7 feet.

At the north End of this room, and on the right side is a great mass of rock that has the appearance of having tumbled in at some time. This fall must have been very long ago because the rocks are covered with a sediment that has cemented the greater part of them together. I tried to find a way beyond this mass of rock but failed so I began to explore for other reasons. I looked around for awhile and finally found an open passage leading up ward